There are people uncharitable snough to think that it is a fondness for preserving in a prightness.

Some of the sweet girls have returned already. They have been sent on as envoys to get the houses open and the servants back and put things generally in running order before the return of the family. I met a couple of them the other day. They were in a cab riding at full speed, and yet they kept leaning out, enjoining the driver to hurry.

"He's gone around that corner," said one of them. "We shall lose him sure. It's proyoking of you to be so slow."

"Sure, ma'am," the driver answers, "Sure, ma'am,"

Being curious about the matter I awaited developments and discovered that these young ladies were trying to run down a young fellow on a bicycle. Of course they succeeded, and through purely feminine tactics they drove him out of the road and made him upset. And then what did the little humburs do but begin to apologize and declare that they thought he was their brother Tom all the time. Perhaps you fall to see the connection between this sort of a performance and house-cleaning, and I must confess that I do too.

The lorgnette grows to be more and more an instrument of feminine warfare. It's a peaceful one, too, if rightly used. I saw a little by-play at Larchmont the other day which amused me immensely. A pretty girl in a sweet gown of blue and white pique, with a big lace parasol, had sauntered out and seated herself on the grass under a big tree. Not far off was one of those young men who think themselves absolutely irresistible. Evidently he made up his mind to interest the young lady. So he began circling around her, each time getting nearer. The girl paid no attention to him but went on calmly reading her book. At last he stopped directly in front of her and was just preparing an elaborate bow and an equally elaborate speech, when the young lady calmly lifted her eyes, placed her lorgnette in front of them and looked at him. The passion of the American woman for appearing to be learned is mnounting to a craze. One of them has evolved an entertainment which she calls a "progressive conversation parky." A square is made of five rows of chairs placed five in a row. They are fastened together with wide bands of ribbon. Each row of chairs has statched to it a delicately-embosed card, bearing a topic of conversation. NOTES OF THE PRESENT AND PAST BY A VETERAN JOURNALIST. A Virginia Mining Enterprise in Alabama-An Interesting Bit of Virginia Family History.

The Georgia Pacific railroad, whose president is a Richmond man, is no doubt destined to be the great freight hauler of the future. There is moved and hauled over the road now daily 6,000 tons of freight and the amount will soon be doubled, because development is daily going on in the country through which it passes. The miners cannot get all the cars they could fill. The road has five Texas connections at Arkansas City, and its traffic to the East is immense. Superintendent William H. Green is untiring in his efforts to make the road put its best foot foremost at all times.

At the death of Mr. Monteiro he left seven sons and one daughter, his eldest son being an infant in arms when brought to Virginia. Francisco, the oldest son, went West somewhere about 1840, and died there, having never married. Henry Zavier married a daughter of Dr. Tredway, and died some years before the late war. Edward Herculano married Miss Lavinia Kean, of Goochland county, a relative of the late Otho G. Kean, of Richmond. He died about 1866, and is buried in Hollywood. His widow died a few years later. Andrew Alcides married Miss Pocahontas Woodson. of Goochland county, and wood. His whole were a reasonable woods on, of Goochland county, and died about 1875. His widow still survives him, and is living with their oldest daughter, the wife of Hon. L. C. Latham, of North Carolina. Dr. Aristides married the daughter of John S. Cocke, of Albemarle county, both of whom are now living at Richmond, Va. James Militadas also married a daughter of John S. Cocke. James died in 1888, his widow surviving him. Walter Archimedes never married. He served gallantly during the war as a soldier in the famous Stonewall brigade, and died in one of the western Territories in 1870. Miss Eurelia, the only daughter, never married. She died about 1878. She was during her life generally conceded to be one of the most superior women of her time, not only intellectually, but in all of the virtues and graces that dignify and adorn the character of woman.

I take it for granted that everybody in Richmond who is anybody knows the genial Dr. Monteiro, editor, Democratic orator, and good fellow. Equally well-known was the versatile and accomplished Andrew A., his brother, the wittiest and most original conversationalist I ever listened to. Dr. Monteiro is the survivor of his immediate family. A daughter of E. H. Monteiro married John A. McCaull, the operatic impressario. The tomb of E. H. Monteiro in Hollywood bears the family name and title both.

WATERTOWN, N. Y., September 13.—A small stream flows through the village of Copenhagen. The inhabitants of that village retired last night without misgivings about the flood, but were awakened shortly after midnight by a crash of water tearing away Wild's steam-mill, dry-house, and machine-shops, and by morning several other buildings were demolished and the sidewalks nearly all swept away. Carthage and Oswegatchie are also flooded, and the Carthage and Adirondacks railroad is washed out in a dozen places. The bare enumeration of the bridges and factories destroyed would make a long article.

During his life John Hampden Pleasants, of the Whig, and ex-Governor William B. Giles were about as intimate with the original Mr. Monteiro as anybody. Mr. Ramos, the venerable barber of your city, knew Mr. Monteiro very well. Whenever he came to Richmond he visited him. I believe in fact the Count de Barros brought Mr. Ramos to the United States and to Virginia. GEORGE C. WILDE.

A GRAND OLD TYPE.

The subject of this notice came to the United States of America and settled in Goochland county, Va. He dropped his title of count on leaving his native land. He is represented by those who knew him in timinately to have been a gentleman of many eccentricities, of vast and varied acquirements, and of courtly and polished manners. A great many ancedotes illustrative of his accomplishments and peculiarities are still current and well authenticated in that county. Although strictly orthodox in his republicanism as applied to government, he was very far from being democratic in his social relations with the citizens of the county of his adoption, albeit one of the most aristocratic in the State. He made but few acquaintances and contracted fewer friendships. During the twenty years of his life in that county I have been informed that he never spent a single night from home at a neighbor's house, nor permitted one of his children to do so. He was an accomplished whist-player and devoted to the game. He gave a good many whist parties during the year, but was never known to invite but three gentlemen to one party, giving as a reason that he did not desire that either himself or one or more of his guests should be excluded.

At the death of Mr. Monteiro he left
